WCl₆ is used as a W source in the production of tungsten (W) and tungsten alloy metallurgy. The most common process for producing tungsten from WCl₆ involves reacting chlorine gas with the metal chloride to form tungsten metal. Other processes may produce tungsten through the reduction of WCl₆, or through the pyrolysis or halide salt reduction of WCl₆. Because of the toxicity of WCl₆, a number of methods of avoiding the use of WCl₆ in the production of tungsten have been devised. Of particular interest are the use of molybdenum hexacarbonyl (Mo(CO)₆) as the W source and the use of metal chlorides, such as cerium chloride (CeCl₃), instead of WCl₆. The WCl₆ may be separated and extracted from a reaction product in the production of W metal or tungsten alloy by various methods.
